The Crimes of Radicalism.

When we consider the crimes which the Radicals have committed, it is almost impossible to doubt that the American people will place the entire condemnation upon the Radical party next month.

The crimes of that party against the people are so numerous and flagrant, so patent and impudent, that they can never be overlooked, even if they are not exposed to the public eye.

They are being actively committed by them in endeavoring to meet an angry and impudent opposition, to divert public attention from their misdeeds by raising false issues, and to drown in passion. The day, however, when prejudice and passion, elation and demagoguery, ruled, is thankless, over, and over, we trust, forever.

Human nature is still, and it was perhaps natural, that in the heat and excitement experienced by civil war, the minds of people should be in a great degree closed to argument and impudent, the appeals of expansion and conquest, to the disposition of the masses, to the claims of the Radicals, and other reasons had full time to resume its sway.

The Radical party took advantage of the condition of the popular mind, during the war to slant its own way, and to fix upon the country a policy and system of governmental administration that under no other circumstances could possibly have been tolerated. That policy and administration, so antagonistic to the Constitution, to the principles of justice, of equality, and to the letter and spirit of the government of government received from the fathers, it now seeks to perpetuate, through the election of its candidates for the President and Vice President, by means as to the nature of which no man can be so mean as to be duped by them.

They are, however, very mean.
